Tarangire National Park

Tarangire National Park is known for its large elephant herds, ancient baobab trees and the Tarangire River, which provides a vital source of water for wildlife. During the dry season, animals gather along the river and around the park's wetlands, creating excellent opportunities for game viewing. The park's varied landscapes include open grasslands, acacia woodland, seasonal swamps and riverine areas, supporting a wide range of wildlife, including giraffe, buffalo, zebra, wildebeest, antelope and several large predators. Located on Tanzania's Northern Safari Circuit, Tarangire offers a rewarding safari experience with fewer visitors than some of the region's better-known parks.

Ancient Giants of Tarangire

Apart from its large herds of elephants, the other 'Giants' that define Tarangire are its magnificent baobab trees. The combination of enormous ancient trees, open savannah and roaming elephant herds gives the park a distinctive character unlike other Northern Tanzania safari destinations.

Baobabs are exceptionally long-lived, with some believed to be more than 1,000 years old. Their unusual shape, with thick trunks and branches resembling roots, has earned them the nickname 'upside-down trees'. During dry periods, baobabs shed their leaves to reduce water loss, producing new leaves when the rains return. Their large, white flowers open in the evening and can be pollinated by bats, insects and other nocturnal animals. The trees are also important to wildlife, providing food and shelter through their flowers, fruit, leaves and bark, while cavities in older trees offer nesting and shelter for birds and other animals.

Silale Swamp

Silale Swamp is a very important wetland area and a key wildlife destination within the park. Fed by seasonal rainfall, the swamp retains water and remains greener than the surrounding landscape during the dry season, attracting elephants, buffalo, giraffe, a variety of antelope and of course, birdlife. The concentration of prey also attracts predators, with lions and other carnivores passing through the area in search of opportunities. Large elephant herds are particularly associated with the area, often moving between the swamp and surrounding woodland. Beyond its wildlife value, Silale Swamp's open plains, wetlands and woodlands create a striking setting for game drives.

Kuro Area

The Kuro area's open terrain makes it an enjoyable area for spotting wildlife, particularly during the dry season when animals move through the plains in search of food and water. The combination of open grassland and surrounding woodland creates varied game-viewing conditions and offers excellent opportunities for photography, especially in the softer morning and late-afternoon light, with the backdrop of baobab trees adding to the scenery.

The Lemiyon Triangle

Located in the northern part of Tarangire National Park, the Lemiyon Triangle is a scenic area known for its characteristic baobab-studded landscape, open woodland and varied birdlife. The area provides opportunities to spot raptors, including tawny and martial eagles, alongside a variety of other bird species.
